

1.1 Customer Overview:

Introduction

A successful restaurant always has a strong relationship with the customers. It is critical to profile the customers to understand the customers' needs, so restaurants can create effective strategies to attract and engage more customers. Customers can be divided into different groups to reflect the difference in demographics, psychographics, geography, and behavior.

Executive Summary

Many McCormick's customers are senior, local, high/middle class people with a high loyalty to the restaurant. Additionally, our client holds private events, broadening its local customer base, to include wedding and funeral receptions, birthday and anniversary celebrations, and private parties for businesses (i.e. Cargill, 3M, etc.); other customer types include seasonal lake boaters and visitors/tourists. This section contains a wide-ranging list of ten of those customers' needs and wants that will help our client recognize shortcomings in their business offerings to their customers. Our team decided on the top three critical needs from this list and expanded on return of Happy Hour promotion service offering, their customers need for unique and delicious food options, and their want for small-scale entertaining activities and events. The more pressing need for McCormick's, which will be a simple but effective change, is the need to bring back their Happy Hour offering so they create superior value for their customers over their competition. A more in depth explanation about our client's customer is found the following section.
